1. The Critical Age Hypothesis (CAH) claims there is a biologically optimal window—ending around puberty—for native-like language learning. Early exposure yields fluency; cases such as “Genie” show that later exposure meets severe limits, as brain plasticity declines with age.
2. Though widely accepted, the CAH is critiqued for oversimplification: motivated adults using effective strategies and quality input can approach native proficiency, and the post-puberty decline in learning ability is less steep and more context-dependent than the CAH implies.
3. The CAH offers useful insights but requires nuance. Children typically master accent and grammar more easily, yet adult learners—armed with motivation, refined cognitive skills, and targeted teaching—can still achieve strong outcomes, albeit with age-related variations in method and pace.
